Children and young people who have experienced trauma often reveal their internal world through their behaviour, this is their language. Adults who support their healing process must become 'interpreters' of this behaviour in order to effect positive change. Children and young people's behaviour often represents the opposite of what they need and being able to identify and respond to what lies "underneath their skin" is critical.

Seminar Objectives:

- To understand how one's 'internal working model' develops
- To discover why children act out
- To develop the ability to translate behaviour
- To understand how your own personal responses can help or hinder the outcome of an intervention
- To explore interventions that work well and those that don't
- To develop the ability to stay calm when all around is chaos

Suitable Audience:

- Carers & workers from foster, permanent, residential, adoptive & kinship care
- Child Protection
- Family Services workers & clients
- Teachers / teacher's aide
- Student welfare / wellbeing professionals
